There's a fine men's choir at work in this program, billed as Encounters With Schumann – gorgeous accounts of the five hunting songs of Opus 137 and the six selections that make up Opus 33. But before you run to the record store or (more likely, these days) your computer, know that there's a gimmick involved. Uwe Kremp (b 1964), a prize-winning German composer, has crafted Tief im Blauen Traum (Deep in the Blue Dream) for men's choir and percussion. It is a set of five fragmented intermezzos that deconstruct Schumann's Op. 33 beyond recognition. Another contemporary composer, Mark Anton Moebius (b 1973) has taken Schumann's hunting songs, complete with the horn quartet, and turned them into Fluchtpunkte eines Jägers (Vanishing Point of a Hunter), a set of commentaries on hunters and their prey that takes the metaphor of the chase for what it is – an act of killing. There's interesting music in both sets, but here's the thing: the contemporary pieces keep alternating with the Schumann songs. Some may find themselves engaged by this dialog, but it drives me up a wall. I find it impossible to settle into either idiom.

Mind you, the level of artistry is high all around, so if you don't mind bouncing back and forth between the 19th and 20th centuries, this could be of interest. But if (like me) you'd prefer to take your Schumann straight and move on to the modernists only after Robert is finished speaking, this could prove jarring in the extreme. For these same songs blissfully uninterrupted, try the terrific MDG 6221316 (Nov/Dec2005).

Back in the days when Michael Gielen was music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (how I enjoyed him, and how I miss him!), he gave a concert that frustrated and infuriated the locals weaned on tonal Romantic music but which interested and thrilled me. He alternated short orchestral pieces by Schubert with short orchestral pieces by Webern to illustrate the musical expression of the first and second Viennese schools of music.

This CD simulates that kind of concert, interspersing some nice but not always inspired male choral pieces by Schumann with vocal and instrumental music based on those themes, harmonies or rhythms by Uwe Kremp and Mark Anton Moebius. I cannot praise Kremp or Moebius highly enough for their imagination or inventiveness. In the manner of Stravinsky, or sometimes Britten and sometimes Segerstam, they either develop new melodies in the tonal style or develop new rhythmic and/or harmonic fantasies on Schumann's songs. Nor does it hurt that the chorus, Die Meistersinger, is not only first-rate in blend and precision but wholly enters the spirit of this enticing sort of fantasy. Hubert Wild, who at first sings a baritone solo, shocks the ear with a stunningly female-sounding countertenor on track 20. Very high marks for the Detmolder Horn Quartet as well.

My lone reservation about the performance is that it sounds just a tad too well rehearsed and not quite spontaneous; but this is a minor quibble, believe me. All the performers work hand-in-glove to produce not only a texturally satisfying performance but also a beautiful flow as the music weaves between Schumann and Kremp in the first half, Schumann and Möbius in the second. Kremp's music is more percussive in rhythm, Möbius's more vocal in concept and more harmonically daring, but it is a close call, and both have written highly effective pieces.

I would love to give a detailed analysis of their scores, but in the interest of space—and in the interest of wanting to leave the disc a bit of a surprise for the first-time (or third-time) listener—I shall reserve my praise to one piece each. The first variation by Kremp deconstructs the first Schumann chorus in a way that strongly reminded me of Stravinsky's work in Pulcinella and especially Le baiser de la fee, while Möbius's most stunning piece was undoubtedly his third variation on the second Schumann work, in which I almost expected the harmonies to drop through a trapdoor into a Mahler or Schoenberg-like soundscape.

Did I say how much I enjoyed this CD? Then I'll say it again. Even if you are not particularly a fan of either Schumann or male choral music (I happen to enjoy the former but am not really addicted to the latter), this CD is a must for any music-lover who considers him or herself open to new sounds and new ways of looking at older works through the mirror of a modern composer's mind.

Well done, all! Now, can we bring Michael Gielen back to Cincinnati?

WDR 3 HörZeichen vom 13. August 2007 (Eva Küllmer/Sabine Weber - 2007.08.13)

Entstanden sind sie teilweise sogar zeitgleich, in Schumanns „Liederjahr 1840“. Stehen die Klavierlieder als Ehrfurcht gebietende Monolithe in der Musiklandschaft, so driften Schumanns Männerchöre ihrer Texte wegen eher in zwielichtige Welten ab. Die Meistersinger, verstärkt vom Detmolder Hornquartett und dem Bariton Hubert Wild, holen sie aus dem Dunkel hervor. Auf der CD „... tief im blauen Traum“ – Encounters with Schumann“ erfahren sie eine Rehabilitierung der besonderen Art.

Am Mikrofon begrüßt Sie heute Sabine Weber.

[Musik 1: Robert Schumann: „Der träumende See“ aus Sechs Lieder op. 33 für Männerchor, Die Meistersinger, Klaus Breuninger (Leitung)]

„Meistersinger“ heißt dieser Männerchor. Doch auch meisterlich präsentiert können Robert Schumanns Männergesänge eine schwer verdauliche Kost werden. Da träumt nicht nur der See – wie eben gehört – sanft vor sich hin. Da wird auch mit schmetternden Hörnern deutsches Jägerblut in Wallung gebracht. Nationalistische Untertöne ächzen zwischen den Zeilen, die heutzutage alles andere als politisch korrekt sind. Vor allem in Schumanns Jagdliedern Opus 137, die auf Texte des Wiener Burgtheater-Direktors Laube zurückgehen, einem – wie man hört – engagierten Dichter des Vormärzes.

[Musik 2: Robert Schumann: „Bei der Flasche“ aus Fünf Jagdlieder op. 137 für Männerchor und vier Hörner, Die Meistersinger, Detmolder Hornquartett, Klaus Breuninger (Leitung)]

Solche Töne hat das Meistersingerensemble auf seiner neuen CD mit Bedacht reproduziert. Gegen die Hornverbrämte Jagdromantik in Schumanns Opus 137 sind neu komponierte Kommentare gesetzt. Sie stammen von Mark Anton Möbius und sollen den chauvinistischen Gestus durchbrechen. Er nennt sie „Fluchtpunkte“.

[Musik 3: Mark Anton Möbius: „Fluchtpunkt eines Jägers V“ für Bariton, Oboe, Horn und Männerchor zu Robert Schumanns Jagdliedern op. 137, Hubert Wild (Bariton), Die Meistersinger, Ingo Goritzki (Oboe), Joachim Bänsch (Horn), Klaus Breuninger (Leitung)]

Möbius arbeitet mit Texten aus Rainer Maria Rilkes achten Duineser Elegie. Der Kölner Bariton Hubert Wild trägt sie vor oder der Männerchor. Sie werden von einer Oboe und einem Horn unterstützt. In den oft auch mit Klangflächen arbeitenden Fluchtpunkten kreiert Möbius Kontrastwelten. Die Schumann Chöre fallen „wie Jäger in den morgendlichen Wald“ dort ein. Der romantische Freiheitskult wird als individuell empfundener Zwang entlarvt.

[Musik 4: Mark Anton Möbius: „Fluchtpunkte eines Jägers IV“ für Bariton, Oboe, Horn und Männerchor zu Robert Schumanns Jagdliedern op. 137, Hubert Wild (Bariton), Die Meistersinger, Ingo Goritzki (Oboe), Joachim Bänsch (Horn), Klaus Breuninger (Leitung)]

Die fünf Intermezzi, die der Komponist Uwe Kremp zwischen die lyrischen und inhaltlich harmlosen sechs Männerchöre aus Schumanns Opus 33 gesetzt hat, spielen mit einzelnen Wort- oder Tonfetzen, beziehungsweise Silben und Rhythmen der Liedstrophen. Unterstützt von zwei Schlagzeugern werden komische, bisweilen ironisierende Irrläufer gezüchtet, die sich im letzten Intermezzo in Sprachlosigkeit auflösen.

[Musik 5: Uwe Kremp: „Intermezzo IV“ aus „...tief im blauen Traum...“ – Fünf Intermezzi zu Robert Schumanns sechs Liedern op. 33 für vierstimmigen Männerchor, Die Meistersinger, Laszlo Hudacsek, Johannes Fischer (Schlagzeug), Klaus Breuninger (Leitung)]

Rein klanglich erzeugen Kremps Intermezzi und auch die Fluchtpunkte von Möbius keine Brüche. Sie schaffen beim Hören aber eine gesunde Distanz. Die teilweise kruden Botschaften der Männerchöre werden dekonzentriert. Ihre musikalisch wertvolle Substanz tritt umso mehr hervor. Und vielleicht finden die Männerchöre Schumanns durch solche Neubelichtungen wieder einen Weg ins Konzertleben. Die CD „... tief im blauen Traum ... Encounters with Schumann ist beim Audite Label erschienen.

This CD is something of a trap for the unwary, for those (like me) who put the disc on without reading the liner-notes properly. The first track consists of the first movement of Schumann's Sechs Lieder, Op. 33 for four-part male-voice chorus. At the end of the movement, Schumann's final phrase repeats accompanied by a rasp of percussion. This continues and develops until we are in an entirely new world.

At this point your reviewer returned to the liner-notes and read them properly. The disc by Die Meistersinger and Detmolder Hornquartett consists of Schumann's Sechs Lieder, Op. 33 and his Fünf Gesänge, Op. 137 for four-part male-voice chorus and four horns. In addition they perform Uwe Kremp's '...tief im blauen Traum...' four-part male voice chorus and two percussionists and Mark Anton Moebius's Fluchtpunkte eines Jägers for four-part male-voice chorus, baritone solo, cor anglais and horn. The point to understand from the notes is that the movements of the Uwe Kremp piece are interleaved with the Op. 33 lieder, so that the effect I perceived at the end of the 1st Schumann movement was deliberate. Similarly Moebius's piece is interleaved with the movements of Schumann's Op. 137.

Die Meistersinger is a male voice choir which has its origins in the Gächinger Kantorei. The ensemble was founded in 1998 and has been conducted by Klaus Breuninger ever since then. They have made a number of discs but this fascinating one seems to be their way of trying to re-vitalise the tradition of the male-voice chorus.

Schumann's works in this genre date from 1840 and seem to have been written for the Leipzig Men's Choir Association for whom Mendelssohn's Op. 50 Lieder were written. We know that in 1836 Schumann, Mendelssohn and friends tried out Mendelssohn's four-part male voice choir pieces - presumably singing one to a part - and Schumann's letters suggest that this might be the case also for his own pieces. This would make sense as we know that Mendelssohn tried out some of Schumann's solo songs before their publication.

The resulting pieces have a robust charm and their particular genre has an atmosphere redolent of the men's associations, glee clubs and the like. I know that Schumann's pieces are far more sophisticated than glees, but the very particular sound of the male voice chorus does give rise to these thoughts.

It is thus understandable that the performers should seek to vary the diet by interspersing Schumann's Six Lieder with Uwe Kremp's Intermezzi. Kremp studied composition in Karlsruhe with Mathis Spahlinger and Wolfgang Rihm. Kremp's Intermezzi use fragments of Schumann's texts, usually taken from the previous verse, to create a dream like extension of the Schumann pieces. Gradually, as the Intermezzi proceed, Kremp dismantles the linguistic elements so that by the end the choir are just singing sounds, not sense. Into this mix, Kremp adds two percussionists "to create an additional resonance space for the noise-like aspects of the consonants in language".

The results are fascinating and make for an interesting mix; we end up listening to the Schumann pieces with new ears. I am not entirely sure that the experiment works completely, but it is certainly worth making and very much worth listening to.

Schumann's Op.137 songs for male-voice choir and French Horns are directly related to the Forest Scenes Op.82. The texts come from Heinrich Laube's Hunting Breviary and the pieces inhabit that Romantic huntsman's world which was tapped into by Weber and others. Mark Anton Moebius's Fluchtpunkte eines Jägers (Vanishing Points of a Hunter), uses a combination of voices, horn and cor anglais to link the Schumann items.

Moebius uses a text taken from Rilke's Eight Duino Elegy to create a series of pieces which meditate on the confrontation between man and animal, his intention being to illuminate the moment when the hunter looks the animal in the eye and recognises himself in it. Like the Kremp/Schumann combination, this is a potent mix which allows us to view and hear the Schumann pieces differently. The solo part requires the singer to mix both baritone and counter-tenor registers, something Hubert Wild does brilliantly.

Not everyone will like this experiment. Kremp and Moebius's pieces can be difficult but are quite approachable, but their alternation with Schumann's music will not be to all tastes. Personally I found it intriguing and fascinating, but would sometimes be tempted to re-programme my CD player so that I could get the Schumann pieces on their own.

Die Meistersinger under their conductor Klaus Beuninger are excellent, managing to perform both the Schumann and the contemporary piece as if they had been performing them all their lives. There was so sense of disjunction between the performances of the Schumann and the modern works, which is quite an achievement.

This is a fascinating disc and if you are open to experiment then you are sure to find much here, especially with such confident performances.
