

Ouverture - Works for Trombone Quartet

aud 97.533

Der neue Merker 01/2008 (Dorothea Zweipfennig - 2008.01.01)

Bläser-Musik nicht nur zu Weihnachten mit dem Münchner Posaunen Quartett, das sich aus 4 illustren Herren zusammensetzt, Musikern der Münchner Philharmoniker/Dany Bonvin, des BR-Symphonie-Orchesters/Thomas Horch, des Bayer. Staatsorchesters/Ulrich Pförtsch und Volker Hensek (den ich nicht zuordnen konnte).

Ouverture, die neue CD, enthält, neben Rossinis „Wilhelm Tell“-Ouvertüre und Donizettis Ouvertüre zu „Don Pasquale“, Brahms „Ungarische Tänze“ sowie Werke von Debussy, Barber, Boismorrier, Bach und Praetorius. Auf der früher erschienenen CD Intermezzo findet man Webers „Freischütz“-Ouvertüre und Fuciks „Einzug der Gladiatoren“ sowie Werke von Verdi, Schubert, Buxtehude, Debussy, Pachelbel, Peueri, Neri, Scheidt, Bach, Kraus und Winklhofer.

Und dann gibt's auch noch ein Brass Quintett München, mit 4 Herren des BR-Symphonie-Orchesters: Hannes Läubin und Thomas Kiechle, Trp. – Thomas Horch, Pos. und Alexander von Puttkamer, Tuba sowie Luiz García, Horn (den ich wieder nicht zuordnen konnte). – Auf ihrer CD Parable/Originalwerke für Brass Quintett erklingt's zeitgenössischer, hier findet man neben Leonard Bernsteins ganz entzückender „Dance Suite“ weitere Werke von John Cheetham, Eugène Bozza, Vincent Persichetti, Witold Lutoslawski, André Previn und Kerry Turner. – Ein Schmankerl für Brass-Fans!

www.critic-service.de Dezember 2009 (Christian Ekowski - 2009.12.01)

Trompeten-Ensembles hört man oft, weil sie zumeist brillant schmettern und den Gesamtklang unüberhörbar dominieren. Darüber sollte man nicht die Posaunen vergessen, die ebenso glanzvoll und virtuos musizieren können. Ein schönes Beispiel bildet diese CD mit dem Münchner Posaunen Quartett, das über alle Maßen schon eingangs die Tanzsuite von Michael Praetorius präzise und technisch meisterhaft vorträgt. Doch es wird eben nicht ständig im Forte-Bereich aufgetrumpft. Die im traurigen Moll auftretende der Sonata à 4 geht in ihrem abgedunkelten Affekt ebenso zu Herzen. Einmal nicht nur bekannte Barockmusik, sondern durch und durch romantische Klänge hören wir mit der Ouvertüre zu Rossinis Oper "Wilhelm Tell". Ganz spannungsvolle Passagen treffen auf ein rasantes Gewitter und einen anschließenden flotten Galopp. Das alles wird technisch perfekt und hinreißend schwungvoll ausgeführt. Im schlendernden Swing geht es in Debussys „Golliwogg's Cakewalk“ vorbei. Mit einem flinken und witzigen Ausgang bei der Ouvertüre zu Donizettis Oper „Don Pasquale“ schließt diese absolut empfehlenswerte Einspielung. Als Geschenk zu allen Jahreszeiten und Anlässen bestens geeignet.

Brass quartets can be most rewarding, as I discovered with the recent Tetrphonics disc of 20th-century music for four saxophones. Far from being an assault on the ears it turned out to be chockful of challenging music very well played [review]. But at least there is some original music for sax quartet, which is not the case with trombones. Hence the Munich quartet's Thomas Horch decided to make his own arrangements of pieces written for other instruments and ensembles.

An arranger and academic Horch is no mean player either, having been principal trombonist with the Berlin Philharmonic from 1987 to 1989. At the time this recording was made – in 1996 – Dany Bonvin and Uli Pförsch were principals with the Munich Philharmonic and Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra respectively, while Volker Hensiek played bass trombone in the Bamberg Symphony.

As much as I wanted to enjoy the earlier items I found there simply wasn't enough variety of timbre and dynamic to hold my attention for long. The Praetorius dances – two ballets, a galliard and a courant – are all despatched in ringing style but there is an relentless quality to the music-making that may deter all but the most dedicated brass fans. Yes, the Bach Prelude and Fugue is neatly done, the opening of the prelude especially sonorous, but there is little character here. The fugue fares rather better, with some deft articulation, but ultimately it all seems a little bloodless.

The Boismortier – originally scored for three flutes and continuo – is cast in the form Adagio-Allegro-Largo-Allegro, the faster movements full of brio and bite, the Largo characterised by a pleasing instrumental blend and real gravitas. Perhaps a warmer, more expansive acoustic might have helped to tame the trombones' natural edge, especially in the more exposed upper registers.

Some extra 'air' would certainly been welcome in the 'horn call' at 4:06 in the Rossini but that said the players achieve some wonderful, rich sonorities in the run-up to the famous gallop. The latter is dashed off in great style; surely one of the more invigorating and infectious arrangements on this disc.

Curiously Barber's Adagio, derived from the second movement of his String Quartet No. 1, Op. 11, has become synonymous with sadness and tragedy. Indeed, listeners of BBC Radio 4's Today programme voted it the 'saddest' piece of classical music ever written. The natural timbre of the trombone – especially in the lower registers – may lend itself to mourning but to their credit the Munich quartet invest the long, flowing melodies with a genuine sense of nobility. The climax is splendid but it's the gentle ending that is most moving. This really is exceptional playing, sensitively done.

The Petite Suite is not the work Debussy wrote for four hands in 1869 but a suite of the arranger's own choosing. First up is the delightful Minstrels from Book I of the Préludes. Delectably sprung, the piece has all the harmonic colouring of the piano original plus a real sense of fun. Taken from the same book The Girl with the Flaxen Hair is rather more serene – after all it is marked Très calme et doucement espressif – eliciting some secure and surprisingly tender playing. There's nothing restrained about the jazz-inflected rhythms of Golliwog's Cakewalk, from Children's Corner (1908). Again the quartet bring a welcome degree of spontaneity to the music, especially in the staccato chords that pepper the piece.

They also rise to the rather different rhythmic challenges of Brahms's 3rd and 4th Hungarian Dances, which come across with plenty of vigour. As a foil to this Magyar moodiness comes the Italianate warmth of the overture to Donizetti's comic masterpiece Don Pasquale. Full of wit and point this is a real test of the trombonists' expressive skills. Needless to say they are more than equal to the task.

This disc gets better with repeated listening, but I still feel the early pieces are the least successful. From the Barber onwards matters improve, though; it's impossible not to smile at the humour of the Cakewalk or bask in the genial warmth of Pasquale. The liner-notes – in English and German – are surprisingly informal, which gives you a pretty good idea of the players' approach to the music. Well worth a spin, even if this isn't your usual fare.

Inhaltsverzeichnis

Der neue Merker 01/2008..... 1
www.critic-service.de Dezember 2009..... 1
www.musicweb-international.com February 2008..... 2

